Visual experience in the developing neocortex is known to influence the structure of cortical maps. However, mapping of the motor cortex has largely been neglected. In the present study, we show that prior visual experience induces large, long-lasting, topographic map changes in the adult primate motor cortex, inducing maps resembling those observed during motor learning. To perform this mapping we used diffusion-tensor imaging (DTI), a non-invasive method that can detect long-range changes in fibre-orientation in large tissue volumes. Our results show that patterns of motor-cortex fibre-orientation changes induced by visual experience are region specific, localised in the precentral gyrus, and their onset is abrupt, preceding visual experience by about 1 month. These results suggest that human, adult cortex has highly plastic topographic maps and that these maps are shaped by visual experience, possibly via anatomical modification of long-distance corticocortical connections.

Objectives ===== Choroidal osteoma is a rare tumor of the choroid with the benign or malignant potential. The bilaterality of the tumor is unusual and only few cases have been reported till date. The clinical presentation of choroidal osteoma is distinct.

Methods ===== A 41-year-old male presented with blurred vision, metamorphopsia in both eyes. The vision in the left eye was 20/60 and corrected to 20/25 with -0.5 lens. The right eye had vision of 20/30 with +0.25 lens and was found to have bilateral exudative retinal detachment. Fundus examination and optical coherence tomography showed giant subfoveal choroidal osteoma, which was attached to fovea in the left eye. Cystoid degeneration was seen over the osteoma. The bone was cyst like with an irregular surface. The size of the osteoma in choroid was $1.6 \times 1.5 \times 2.2$ mm in the left eye and $2.4 \times 2.2 \times 3.3$ mm in the right eye. Total retinal detachment in the right eye was confirmed by B scan echography. Magnetic resonance imaging with contrast showed large bony tumor (21×14 mm) in the
